Let Small Problems Remain Small

Benjamin Disraeli said, Little things affect little minds.

I know of people who treat every little conflict, every little irritation, every little obstacle as a life-and-death emergency. I pity them. Because if we want to win in life, a master skill that we need to learn is the ability to let small problems remain small—and believe me, most of our problems are small.

Wisdom is knowing what to overlook.

Has someone criticized you unfairly?

Did it rain during your out-door party?

Has a friend taken you for granted?

Is the office air conditioner conking out again?

Has another car just cut you in traffic?

Did your husband forget to fix the faucet?

Did the washing machine rip your favorite shirt?

You could decide to make a big issue out of it, use it to destroy your day, make it an excuse to be bitchy towards your family, and allow it to complicate your life.

Or you could choose the simple path.

The choice is really yours.

Question: How do you react to problems? Try to think of a current problem now and then look at the bigger picture of life. Ask yourself: Will this problem matter twenty years from now?

Let small problems remain small.
