Reflection: 25th Sunday Gospel (Luke 16, 1-13) Economic Justice

Everyone, even secretly, has mused about sudden wealth. What would we do with the money? Pay bills? Quit employment? Buy new dwellings? Go on an extended vacation? What would we do?

Of course, the opposite is true. We all fear losing the little money we have. What would happen if we lost our jobs? Our banks defaulted? Our retirement suddenly "went up in smoke?" What would we do? Money has become a driving force in middle-class families. We dream about it. We fear living without it. Accumulated wealth has become a measure of self-worth in modern culture.

How we use money can determine our futures. Jesus made the same observation. But with a different and unexpected result.

In Luke's gospel, Jesus addressed some practical aspects of the seventh commandment, for it entails the use of wealth. This commandment teaches us to treat others' property and abilities with respect, since a person's goods and talents are meant for everyone's benefit. The seventh commandment not only tells us not to take others' property or enslave them, it teaches us that when we deny of our own property and talents for others' good, we are sinning.

The seventh commandment implies an "economic" justice. Economic justice is the view that everyone should share in the goods of the earth in a just and loving manner. Economic justice also demands that everyone work together for these goods, according to their abilities. Work is the primary value of economic justice, because the human person who works has the greatest value.

How can we honor the seventh commandment? We can honor the seventh commandment by sharing our time, our talents, and our goods with others, especially the poor. Sharing with the poor shows love of neighbor and is an act of justice.

How do we use our wealth? What we do with our money and possessions does show the world our priorities. Are we self-indulgent? Or do we focus on others? While these two questions might form a continuum between selfishness and altruism, our place on that line can be clearly seen. Others will see whether we glorify God or glorify self.

Posture during the

Eucharistic Prayer:

The posture to be assumed by the faithful at the Consecration is kneeling (GIRM, 43). When the new missal was released, the bishops in Saskatchewan – and in some other places – interpreted that we were to kneel just prior to the Consecration, but after seven years of experience, and little consistency in practice, I would ask that we now kneel at the conclusion of the Sanctus (‘Holy, Holy, Holy’) and to stand when the priest announces ‘The Mystery of Faith’. Those who may not be able to kneel for such reasons as infirmity are invited to sit. In parishes where there are no kneelers, or when Mass is celebrated in a school or setting without pews and kneelers, you are invited to discern the most appropriate reverential posture for that place.
